

Central Vermont

Leave the city life behind and visit Central Vermont, with its wide variety of rural landscapes and small towns. The Connecticut River lazily flows along the eastern border of the state, bordering many small farming communities, with access points for fishing and boating. Central Vermont is proud to be the state's agricultural seat. Quechee Gorge, known as "Vermont's Grand Canyon," and marble quarries leave a dramatic visual impact on visitors and the relationship between these natural wonders and Vermont's stone trade is easily recognized. Scenic Route 100 meanders along the mountain range from Mount Ellen to Okemo and Killington. The Long Trail parallels Rt. 100 to the west along the mountain peaks and from the Long Trail, the Appalachian Trail branches off and winds easterly to the Connecticut River. The western portion of the region is dotted with many small lakes, rivers, and Lake Champlain along the western border.

Because of the variety of both state and private campgrounds in this region, the smallest with primitive sites or as a part of a working farm, to the larger resorts with full hookups on the lake, a variety of activities awaits every outdoor enthusiast. The lakes and rivers offer re-freshing opportunities to swim, fish, or boat; or the chance to sit by the evening campfire and watching the sunset reflect off the water. Golfers will find numerous courses throughout the region, just a short distance from their campground. Hikers can try new trails, including many along the mountain peaks, offering spectacular challenges and wonderful views. Bicyclists can follow scenic back roads through quiet villages, or travel the mountain roads at numerous off-season ski areas.

The region's farmers markets, country stores, flea markets, and museums will spark the interest of any shopper. Throughout the summer and fall, the visitors will find numerous craft, art, and antique shows, agricultural fairs detailing how Vermont has grown in 200 years, and outlets for the many products boasting the "Vermont Made" seal. No visit would be complete without seeing the 150 year old State Capital building in Montpelier, where tours are offered during the summer and fall months.
